TA 577. Women in American Theatre and Drama - WC 3 Units Term Typically Offered: Occasionally Offered Description: The lack of gender parity in American theatre was in the spotlight in the Spring of 2017, when Paula Vogel and Lynn Nottage, two veteran, Pulitzer-Prize winning playwrights, finally received Broadway debuts. The title of Michael Paulson's New York Times piece on this momentous event in American theatre history asks a crucial question pursued by this course: "Two Female Playwrights Arrive on Broadway. What Took So Long?" Paulson points out a glaring discrepancy between the gender demographics of Broadway spectators and the gender identities of the authors produced on Broadway. Roughly 67% of Broadway audiences are female; yet, Vogel's Indecent and Nottage's Sweat were the only new plays by women in a Broadway season that included eight new plays by men. Paulson also notes that the presence of two new plays by women in the 2016-17 Broadway season signals that some strides have been made since the 2013-14 Broadway season, which featured no new plays by women.
